In recent years, many professors have published studies of college students’ sexualities. The growing scholarly literature on collegiate sexuality includes a number of journal articles as well as several books—such as Peggy Reeves Sanday’s Fraternity Gang Rape, Robert A. Rhoads’ Coming Out in College, and Michael Kimmel’s Guyland. Meanwhile, much student writing on student sexuality has been more sensational than scholarly. Tucker Max's I Hope They Serve Beer in Hell, Alecia Oleyourryk and Vanessa White's Boink (the magazine and the book), and Karen F. Owen's viral “fuck list,” in particular, appear to have resonated with many fellow students. CTSJ, being a journal of undergraduate research, would welcome submissions from students who choose to write critically about collegiate sexuality. Topics might include:

- Emerging gender and sexual identities, including “gender non conforming” and “genderqueer”. Have (some) college students transcended the heterosexual binary that structures straight, gay, lesbian, bi, trans, and queer identities?
- The orgasm gap between men and women who engage in heterosexual hookups. Why is there a gap? Given that there is a gap, why do women hookup? Is the gap confined to one-time hookups?
- Limits and alternatives to the concept of consent. Does drunkenness make college policies concerning the mental condition necessary to give consent irrelevant? Who is harmed or benefited by current policies?
- The near invisibility of students of color in research on collegiate sexuality. Is hooking up a white(ning) practice?
- The epistemology of status updates. How do students manage sexual identity on Facebook?
- STDs and safe-sex practices. Why do students rarely (or never) use condoms for fellatio? Do students tend to conflate risk of disease with risk of pregnancy?

Manuscript submissions will be accepted on an ongoing basis through July 1, 2011. Publication is scheduled for October 2011.

Please see the Policies and Submission Info page for submission details: http://scholar.oxy.edu/ctsj/policies.html.